Notes.

NOTES ON THE MANAGEMENT OF MARINE DIESEL ENGINES.

In reply to Mr. D. P. Peel's note inserted in the March issue of the Institute's Transactions regarding the timing of the exhaust and air inlet valves as stated in my paper on the maintenance of marine Diesel engines.

The valve timing stated in the paper is as intended, the exhaust valve closing 10° after the top dead centre, and the inlet valve opening 20° before the top dead centre, this gives the valves an overlap opening of 30° .

The object of making the valves overlap in their opening is to expel as much of the burnt gases in the clearance space as possible. The presence of burnt gases in the cylinder during combustion is detrimental to the proper burning of the fuel and may tend to cause smoking.

Consider the exhaust stroke of the cycle with the piston moving upwards and the gases flowing through the exhaust valve until such a time as the piston has almost reached the top of its stroke. It is now assumed that the gases in the exhaust pipe have attained a certain velocity moving in a direction away from the exhaust valve and the tendency for this moving mass will be to create a vacuum behind it and draw more gas from the cylinder.

The inlet valve having opened 20° before the top dead centre the air will take advantage of the partial vacuum created in the cylinder and have time to acquire a certain velocity by the time the piston has reached the top dead centre. This air flowing into the cylinder when the exhaust valve is still open will have a scavenging effect in the cylinder, and when the exhaust valve does close, the clearance volume of the cylinder should have a large proportion of pure air within its walls, which it otherwise would not have had but for the overlap of the two valves.

HOMER McCRRICK.
